

How much will a young Parisian sacrifice to make her mark?

The PARIS
SEAMSTRESS
NATASHA
LESTER

Author of the bestselling A Kiss from Mr Fitzgerald

The quotation on page 131 from Fashion is Spinach is copyright © 1938 Elizabeth Hawes.
Reproduced by permission of Dover Publications, Inc.

The quotation on pages 293–294 is from 'Do Not Stand at My Grave and Weep' by Mary Elizabeth Frye.
Every effort has been made to contact copyright holders of materials reproduced in this book. If anyone has further information, please contact the publishers.

Published in Australia and New Zealand in 2018
by Hachette Australia
(an imprint of Hachette Australia Pty Limited)
Level 17, 207 Kent Street, Sydney NSW 2000
www.hachette.com.au

Copyright © Natasha Lester 2018

This book is copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purposes of private study, research, criticism or review permitted under the Copyright Act 1968, no part may be stored or reproduced by any process without prior written permission.
Enquiries should be made to the publisher.

A catalogue record for this book is available from the National Library of Australia

ISBN 978 0 7336 4000 1 (pbk.)

Cover design by Christabella Designs
Cover photographs courtesy Shutterstock and Trevillion Images
Author photograph courtesy of Stef King/stefking.com.au
Typeset in 13.75/16.08 pt Centaur MT Std by Bookhouse, Sydney
Printed and bound in Australia by McPherson's Printing Group

The paper this book is printed on is certified against the Forest Stewardship Council® Standards. McPherson's Printing
Group holds FSC® chain of custody certification SA-COC-005379.
FSC® promotes environmentally responsible, socially beneficial and economically viable management of the world's forests.

For Ruby.

I promised that you could start reading my books when you were twelve. It seemed so far away at the time. But now you are twelve and you are my kindred spirit. I hope you continue to love books and history forever.

Happy reading, my gorgeous girl.

PART ONE

Estella

Chapter One

2 JUNE 1940

Estella Bissette unrolled a bolt of gold silk, watching it kick up its heels and cancan across the worktable. She ran her hand over it, feeling both softness and sensuality, like rose petals and naked skin. ‘What’s your story morning glory,’ she murmured in English.

She heard her mother laugh. ‘Estella, you sound more American than the Americans do.’

Estella smiled. Her English-language tutor had said the same thing to her when he ended her lessons the year before and joined the exodus out of Europe; that she had a better American accent than he did. She tucked the roll under one arm and draped the silk across her shoulder. Then she swung into a tango, heedless of the women’s cries of, ‘Attention!’, cries which only goaded her to add a song to her dance: Josephine Baker’s fast and frothy ‘I Love Dancing’ bubbling from her mouth between gasps of laughter.

She dipped backwards, before soaring upright too fast. The roll of silk skimmed over the midinette’s worktable, just missing Nannette’s head but slapping Marie on the shoulder.

‘Estella! Mon Dieu!’ Marie scolded, holding her shoulder with overplayed anguish.

Estella kissed Marie's cheek. 'But it deserves a tango at the very least.' She gestured to the fabric, glowing like a summer moon amid the quotidian surroundings of the atelier, surely destined for a dress that wouldn't just turn heads; it would spin them faster than Cole Porter's fingers on the piano at the infamous Bricktop's jazz club in Montmartre.

'It deserves for you to sit down with it and start work,' Marie grumbled.

Monsieur Aumont appeared in the doorway, drawn by the noise. He took one look at Estella draped in silk, smiled and said, 'What is ma petite étoile up to now?'

'Injuring me,' Marie complained.

'It's lucky you have enough flesh to withstand Estella's antics,' Monsieur Aumont said teasingly and Marie muttered something under her breath.

'What are we making with it?' Estella asked, lovingly stroking the folds of gold.

'This,' Monsieur Aumont replied, handing over a sketch with a flourish.

It was a Lanvin, a reworking of the 1920s La Cavallini dress, but instead of an oversized bow adorned with thousands of pearls and crystals, the bow was decorated with hundreds of petite gold silk rosebuds.

'Oh!' she breathed, reaching out to touch the sketch. She knew the delicate rows of flowers would look like a brilliant swirl of gold from afar and that their true composition – an undulating ribbon of roses – would only become apparent if one was close enough to the wearer to see it properly. There wasn't a military epaulette in sight, nor a gas mask case slung across the shoulder, nor was the dress coloured one of the many variations of blue – Maginot blue, Royal Air Force blue, tempered steel blue – which Estella had grown to loathe. 'If one day my sketches look like this,' she said, admiring Lanvin's exquisite illustration, 'I'll be so happy I'll never need a lover.'

'Estella!' Marie reprimanded, as if no 22-year-old should even know the meaning of the word, let alone speak it aloud.

Estella looked across at Jeanne, her mother, and grinned.

True to form, her mother continued to make tiny pink cherry blossoms from silk and didn't look up or intervene but Estella could see that she was pressing her lips together to stop a smile, knowing her daughter loved nothing more than to shock poor Marie.

'A dress is no match for a lover,' Monsieur Aumont admonished. He indicated the silk. 'You have two weeks to turn this into a golden bouquet.'

'Will there be a remnant?' Estella asked, still holding the bolt of fabric tightly to her.

'They've sent forty metres but I've calculated that you only need thirty-six – if you're careful.'

'I'll be as careful as a dream weaver making Leavers lace,' Estella said reverently.

She took the silk away to be stretched over a wooden frame, held in place by rows of nails. A solution of sugar and water was applied to stiffen the fabric enough so that Marie could stamp circles out of it with the heavy iron cutters.

Once Marie had finished, Estella covered a foam block with a piece of clean white fabric, heated her shaping ball over a low flame, tested the temperature in a pot of wax, set the first round gold disc of silk onto the white fabric, then pressed the shaping ball into the silk. It curled up instantly around the heated ball to form one lovely rosebud. She laid the rosebud to one side then repeated the process, making two hundred flowers by lunchtime.

While she worked, she chatted and laughed with Nannette, Marie and her mother, as they did every day, until Nannette said quietly, 'I've heard there are more French soldiers fleeing from the north now than Belgian or Dutch civilians.'

'If the soldiers are fleeing, what stands between us and the Germans?' Estella asked. 'Are we supposed to hold Paris with our sewing needles?'

‘The will of the French people stands before the Boche. France will not fall,’ her mother insisted and Estella sighed.

It was pointless to have the argument. Much as she wished to keep her mother safe, Estella knew that she and her mother weren’t going anywhere. They would continue to sit in the atelier and make flowers from fabric as if nothing mattered more than fashion because they had nowhere else to go. They wouldn’t be joining the refugees streaming down from the Netherlands, Belgium and the north of France to the south because they had no family in the country to whom they could run.

In Paris they had a home and work. Out there, nothing. So, even though her mother’s blind faith in France’s ability to withstand the German army worried Estella, she had no reply. And was it so wrong that, inside the walls of the atelier, they could all pretend, for perhaps only a few more days, that if couturiers like Lanvin still wanted gold silk flowers made, then everything would be all right?

During their lunch hour, as they ate bowls of rabbit stew in the atelier’s kitchen, Estella sat apart from the other women and drew. In pencil on paper she sketched out the lines of a long, slim skirt that fell to the floor, a dress with sleeves capped at the shoulders, a waistline with a thin sash of gold silk, a neckline cut into an elegant V and ornamented with lapels like those on a man’s shirt – a touch nobody would expect on a floor-length gown but one that Estella knew made it both modish and matchless. Despite the skirt’s close fit, it could still be danced in: it was bold and gold, a dress to live life in. And in Paris in June 1940, anything that promised life was welcome.

Her mother finished her stew and, even though there was still fifteen minutes remaining of their lunch hour, she threaded her way through the atelier to Monsieur Aumont’s office. Estella watched their faces as they spoke quietly to one another. Monsieur, one of the gueules cassées of the Great War – men who’d had part of their faces destroyed, as he had, by flamethrowers, leaving him with distorted lips, barely a nose, a monstrous face that Estella no longer noticed and which he covered with a copper mask outside the atelier – was unabashedly vocal in his opposition to the Germans, or the Boche, as he and her mother preferred to call them. Estella had lately seen men coming and going from the atelier after they'd met with Monsieur on the stairs, men who were ostensibly delivering fabric or dye but whose boxes only the Monsieur ever unpacked.

And her mother – one of the 700 000 women left a widow by the Great War, her soldier husband dying not long after they were married, when Jeanne was only fifteen. Two people who had reason to hate the Germans and who seemed to speak too often in whispers, whispers that looked too serious to be of the romantic sort.

Estella bent her head back over her sketch when her mother returned.

'Très, très belle,' Jeanne said of her daughter's illustration.

'I'm going to make it from the remnant tonight.'

'And then wear it to La Belle Chance?' her mother asked, referring to the jazz club in Montmartre that Estella frequented still, despite the fact that since the French army had been mobilised last year and the British had fled at Dunkirk in May, there were few men to be found in the city; only those whose jobs in munitions factories exempted them from service.

'Oui.' Estella smiled at her mother.

'I will be at the Gare du Nord.'

'You'll be tired tomorrow.'

'Just as you were this morning,' her mother chided.

Last night it had been Estella who'd stood at the train station. She'd been the one handing out bowls of soup to the refugees streaming through Paris, some of whom had been lucky enough to arrive by train, many of whom had walked hundreds of miles to escape the Germans. Once fed, the refugees took up their trail again until they found a home with relatives, or else they continued on as far as their legs could carry them, as far as they could get from the war, across the Loire River where it was said they would be safe.

The day drifted by, rosebud after rosebud. At six o'clock, Estella and her mother joined arms and left, walking along Rue des Petits Champs behind the Palais Royal, past the Place des Victoires and Les Halles, horse-drawn wagons for transporting food standing in a line out the front now, not vans. As they walked, the realities that Estella had been trying to ignore beneath a roll of spectacular gold silk asserted themselves.

First was the eerie quiet; it wasn't silent but at this time of night they should be surrounded by seamstresses and tailors and cutters and models all finished for the day and making their way home. But there were few people walking past the empty ateliers and empty shops; so much emptiness where, once upon a time, even a month ago, Paris had been full of life. But when the drôle de guerre – the phoney war – ended on May the tenth as Hitler's army pushed into France, the rush of people out of Paris had begun. First the Americans in cars driven by chauffeurs, then the families with older cars, then those who'd been able to find a horse and cart.

But the June night was warm and soft and scented with lilac, the horse chestnut trees wore strands of pearl-like flowers and here and there a restaurant was still open, a cinema, the House of Schiaparelli. Life went on. If only one could ignore the cats that roamed the streets, left behind when their owners fled the city, the covered streetlights, the windows obscured by blackout curtains, all of which told a different story from the romance of summer in Paris.

'I saw you talking with Monsieur,' Estella said abruptly, once they'd crossed over Rue du Temple and were enveloped in the familiar scent of decay and leather that was the Marais.

'He is coming with me tonight, as usual,' Estella's mother said.

'To the Gare du Nord?' Estella persisted, unable to shake the feeling that, lately, on the nights her mother had been out, it was to do more than serve soup to refugees.

'Oui.' Estella's mother squeezed her arm. 'I will start at the Gare du Nord.'

‘And then?’

‘I will be careful.’

Which confirmed all of Estella’s suspicions. ‘I’ll come with you.’

‘No. It’s better if you enjoy whatever time there is left.’

And Estella suddenly understood that all the talk about France standing strong was a fervent wish, not false belief, a wish her mother held for her daughter’s sake. And, not for the first time in her life, Estella felt an overwhelming gratitude to her mother, who’d raised Estella by herself, who’d made sure she went to school, who’d worked hard to feed and clothe and shelter her, who never complained, who had such a small life, confined to the atelier and to her daughter.

‘I love you, Maman,’ she whispered, kissing her mother’s cheek.

‘That’s the only thing that matters,’ her mother said, giving a rare and beautiful smile, altering the contours of her face so that she looked more her age, which was only thirty-seven – not old at all. Estella wanted to stitch that moment into the night, thread it so tightly against the sky that it could never be unpicked.

Instead she watched her mother walk up Rue du Temple towards the Gare du Nord. Then Estella continued on to the Passage Saint-Paul, a tiny, dirty alleyway which led to a hidden entrance to the beautiful Église Saint-Paul-Saint-Louis, and on which their apartment was also located. As she pushed open the front door of the building, the concierge, Monsieur Montpelier, an old drunk of a man, grunted and thrust a note at her.

She read it and swore under her breath. It was the last thing she wanted to do tonight.

‘Putain,’ the concierge hissed at her choice of words.

Estella ignored him. She’d scald his eyeballs later when she left in her gold dress but, right now, she had work to do. She hurried up six flights of winding stairs to the apartment and, even though it was June, put on a long cloak. Then she walked back the way she’d come until she reached the buying offices of one of the American department stores off the Rue du Faubourg Saint-Honoré.

Madame Flynn, who must have been one of the only Americans left in Paris, was, as Estella knew she'd be, alone in her office. On the desk in front of her was a stack of boxes labelled Schiaparelli. 'Be as quick as you can,' Madame Flynn said, turning her back as if she didn't know what Estella was about to do when of course the opposite was true.

Estella removed the dresses from the boxes and hid them under her cloak. Without a word to Madame Flynn, she hurried back down the stairs, along the street and up another set of stairs to the copy house where Estella moonlighted when the fashion shows were on. During the shows, sketchers like her could capture, on a good day, fifteen copies of haute couture dresses which she then sold to the copy house or American department store buyers.

The market in Paris and America for copies of Chanel, Vionnet, Lanvin, Callot Soeurs, Mainbocher – all the couturiers – was insatiable. Estella had always known she could earn more money working at the copy house. But she also knew that if she spent every day copying – stealing really – other people's designs then she'd never have the heart to create her own. So she only worked as a sketcher during the shows, pencil flying discreetly over the paper so that the vendeuse wouldn't notice she was doing more than mark the number of the dress that had caught her attention, scrutinising the models wafting elegantly through the salle, capturing details: the number of pleats in a skirt, the width of a lapel, the size of a button – praying for the model to be a slow walker so that Estella didn't end up with unfinished sketches that she'd never be able to sell.

The Chanel show was always Estella's favourite. There, it was a true challenge to capture fifteen sketches. Although the lines were simpler, the elegance was so manifest that she had to work harder than ever to catch it; it was more than just fabric and buttons and zippers. Each dress had a soul. And, at Chanel, everything was quiet and serene. She lacked the cover of the circus atmosphere that prevailed at a house like Patou, beneath which one could easily hide their dirty work. No, at Chanel, the vendeuse had sharper eyes than a sniper. Each guest received a slip of paper to make notes on rather than a large programme perfect for hiding sketches and Estella had to draw while appearing not to move her pencil at all.

She'd always convinced herself it was a game and now that the American buyers weren't coming over to see the shows because of the war, her income from the last season had been much smaller so she'd told herself she had to take the opportunities when they were offered. Then she could pay off a little more of the debt that she and her mother owed Monsieur Aumont for the English lessons her mother had insisted Estella take every day after school since she was six. Lessons which her mother hadn't been able to afford and for which the Monsieur had lent them the money – French women were not allowed to have their own bank accounts, and therefore couldn't borrow money from a bank. They couldn't vote either; they were an underclass, meant to sit unobtrusively at home and bake and breed.

Thus the war had come as a terrible shock for some, unused to doing anything besides dress as well as they could afford. Luckily, Jeanne Bisette, through necessity, had brought Estella up to be more resourceful than most. Which meant Estella knew that, while Monsieur Aumont would write off the debt in an instant, it was a matter of immense pride for Estella's mother that they paid off every last cent. It would be impossible to do so without Estella's extra income.

It was the English lessons that had allowed Estella to do so well as a sketcher; none of the American buyers spoke French so they all preferred to deal with her. If she didn't respond to Madame Flynn's summonses, the debt would trouble her mother, a debt Estella had only added to during the year she'd spent at the Paris School, the French campus on the Place des Vosges of the New York School of Fine and Applied Art. There, until war had shut it down, Estella had formed a dream of one day seeing her own name on a fashion atelier, of having customers wear dresses designed by her rather than stolen by her. But it was at moments like this, with six Schiaparelli dresses stuffed beneath her cloak, that she knew it would never happen, that an American buyer like Madame Flynn taking a commission from a copy house to lend them a selection of dresses to duplicate was in poor taste and a designer like Elsa Schiaparelli would stitch Estella's eyelids shut if she knew.

Estella vowed this would be the last time.

But, right now, Madame Chaput was waiting for Estella to begin. The fitters took the dresses Estella produced from beneath her cloak and made patterns while Estella sketched and Madame Chaput noted what kind of buttons she would need and stole snippets of fabric from the seams where nobody would notice. Then Madame gave Estella the money for a taxi and Estella returned the dresses to Madame Flynn along with the commission Madame Chaput paid for having been given access to the dresses to copy. Estella knew the dresses would be on a boat to New York tomorrow – if boats were still sailing given the turmoil of the last few days – and that Madame Chaput would have models made up within two days, ready to sell to her line of loyal Parisians who wanted all of the haute but none of the cost of couture in their wardrobe.

Then Estella walked back to the Marais again, knowing she'd have to be quick if she was to sew her gold dress into being and still make it to the jazz club before midnight. Back at the apartment building, she filled a bucket with water from the tap in the courtyard. Under the gleaming eye of the concierge, who loathed Estella and her mother for their refusal to make obeisance to him and buy him port at Christmas, and who enjoyed watching the deprivation of those who lived in one of the many Parisian apartment buildings without running water, she hauled the bucket up to the top floor – the cheapest floor. She put some water into a kettle, set it on the stove and made a cup of coffee. Then she sat down at her sewing machine, took out her scissors and cut the fabric to the sketch she'd drawn at the atelier, wishing she had the luxury of a cutter who'd make the line of the dress as perfect as she wished it to be, knowing she'd never be a Vionnet who worked from scissors rather than sketches.

It took her an hour and a half, but when it was done she grinned; it looked exactly as she'd intended. She slipped the dress on and frowned at her scuffed shoes, but her skills didn't stretch to cobbling and she hadn't the money to buy a new pair of pumps. She threw on her cloak in case the evening grew cold later, eschewed the gas mask she was supposed to carry but made the one concession her mother asked of her – to carry a white handkerchief so that she could perhaps be seen by cars in the blacked-out city.

Once in Montmartre, she bypassed Bricktop's – she couldn't afford that – and entered a club that was decidedly less elegant but definitely more fun, where the Montmartre patois syncopated between saxophone riffs and where one man, a munitions worker no doubt, tried to squeeze past her a little too tightly. She fought him off with a hard stare and a few well-chosen words and slipped into a seat at a table beside Renée, one of Monsieur Aumont's daughters.

'Bonsoir,' Renée said, kissing her cheeks. 'Do you have any Gauloises left?'

Estella produced her last two and they both lit up.

'What are you wearing?' Renée asked with a bemused laugh.

'I made it.'

'I guessed as much. It's not something you'd find on the racks at BHV.'

'Exactly.'

'Isn't it a touch . . . outlandish?'

Estella shook her head. Renée was wearing one of the Heidi-style dresses that had been hanging forlornly on the racks at Au Printemps as if they'd forgotten the way back to the mountains and she looked like every other woman in the club: demure, watered down, like the wine they were drinking.

‘Why would we expect anything less from Estella?’ Another voice, one with a smile inside it, carried over to their table. Huette, Renée’s sister, leaned down to kiss Estella’s cheeks. ‘You look magnifique,’ Huette said.

‘Dance with me.’ A man rudely interrupted them. He smelled like the Pigalle at midnight – liquored, fragranced with perfume from the necks of the dozen other girls he’d already taken a turn with on the dance floor. A man revelling in the advantage of his scarceness, who would have, with his lack of manners, no chance at all were most men not away fighting.

‘No thank you,’ Estella said.

‘I will,’ Renée said.

‘I wanted her.’ The man pointed at Estella.

‘But none of us want you,’ she said.

‘I do,’ Renée said, almost desperately, and Estella knew it was a sign of the times; a girl could spend all night without a dance partner and here was one before them, albeit coarse, but what did that matter?

‘Don’t,’ Huette said to Renée.

As Estella watched Huette put a hand on her sister’s arm, a spontaneous act – one that told of how much she loved Renée no matter how irritating she could be – Estella felt a stab of yearning. It was followed immediately by an awareness of how silly she was; wishing for something she’d never have. She should be grateful that she even had a mother, rather than selfishly covet someone’s sister.

The man pulled Renée to her feet, leading her to the dance floor, making sure to hold her as close as he could and Estella turned away, revolted, when she saw him press his crotch into Renée.

‘Come and sing. We’ll change the tempo to something fast so she can get away from him,’ Estella said.

Huette followed her over to the four old-timers who comprised the band, with whom Estella and Huette had spent many evenings playing piano and singing, putting their school music lessons to work. Estella’s mother had learned to sing at a convent school she’d attended when she was younger and she'd always sung at home, adorning their apartment with music rather than useless gewgaws, and she'd passed on her love of song to Estella from a very early age. But while her mother's preference was for operatic hymns, Estella's was for deep and throaty jazz.

The musicians didn't miss a beat as they kissed Estella's cheeks and Luc, the pianist, complimented her dress in a patois so thick and dirty no ordinary Frenchwoman could have understood it. He finished the song then stood up to get a drink at the bar. Estella sat down at the piano and Huette joined Philippe at the microphone. Estella picked out the notes to 'J'ai Deux Amours' and the crowd applauded appreciatively. As Estella played, she hoped everyone in the room had a love for Paris strong enough that it would save the city from whatever might soon befall it as the Germans drew ever closer. But Huette's voice wasn't high enough for the song so she bumped Estella off the piano and made Estella sing it, which she did.

Every patron in the club joined her for the final chorus, letting Estella believe, for just a few seconds, that everything would be fine: that Paris was too grand, too legendary, too brilliant to ever be troubled by a short and grotesque man like Adolf Hitler.

She stayed at the club for only a short time after that, laughing with Philippe and Huette and Luc until she became aware that they hadn't managed to save Renée, that she was leaving with the brute of a man who'd asked her to dance and Estella suddenly felt tired, far older than twenty-two, and more melancholy than ever.

'Time for me to go,' Estella said, rising and kissing everyone twice on the cheeks.

Once out in the Paris night, she didn't walk straight back to the apartment. She wound her way through the dirt and dilapidation of the Marais, a dereliction all the more obvious at each of the hôtels particulier, once grand homes of the nobles that, no matter what had been done to them – their transformation into jam factories and the desecration of their stately courtyards beneath piles of cart wheels, pallets and lean-tos – still held their heads high. As Estella brushed her hand over the stone walls, the same way she'd caressed the roll of gold silk in the atelier, she wondered if the elegance imprinted in those walls – the same as the way a couture dress never lost the line that set it apart from pret-a-porter – would withstand Stuka bombings and an army of men in cold grey uniforms.

The Carreau du Temple was quiet as she passed, the fabric and second-hand clothes sellers all abed, ready to be up at dawn selling the discarded garments they'd found in the rubbish bins of those who lived over by the Champs Élysées. Indeed the whole area was quiet, Estella often the only one on the street as she strolled through her city, taking in things she'd grown used to but which were too beautiful to take for granted now that they might be lost: the fading brilliance of the red, gold and blue painting over the porte de l'hôtel de Clisson, the building's curved medieval turrets framing the gateway like a pair of plump sentries; the symmetrical pavilions and grand arched passage of the Carnavalet.

Without meaning to, she found herself outside a house on the Rue de Sévigné, an abandoned hôtel particulier that her mother had often taken her to when she was younger, where Estella had played amongst the disused rooms, a place that Estella suspected was the location of her mother's meetings with Monsieur Aumont. But with the blackout curtains in place, the streets glazed a preternatural blue by the covered streetlights, it was impossible to see if anyone was inside. Not French Baroque like its neighbours, and eschewing symmetry and form, the house lurked in true Gothic style, the hunchback of the street. Its coroneted turrets should have put her in mind of fairytale palaces but instead they made her think of women held prisoner at the top of the tower, all escape routes cut off.

Impulse made her push open the wooden door that led into the courtyard, the statuary of the Four Seasons gazing imperiously down on her from the walls of the house, including a headless Summer bereft of his power. The gravel paths had not been swept and raked for many years but still formed a star shape, each spoke divided by hedges that had long since outgrown formality and now shot and twisted where they wished. Mint, probably once confined to a herb garden, waved its stems wildly, perfuming the air with the hot scent of danger. And then she heard it. The scrape of a foot over stone. Fear ran its teeth along her back like a zipper.

She turned. There, collapsed on a rickety bench, was Monsieur Aumont. The smell of blood and panic rose off his clothes and his skin.

'Mon Dieu!' she gasped.

He lifted his head and Estella saw a dark stain on the front of his shirt. 'Take these,' he whispered, passing Estella a small bundle, 'to the Théâtre du Palais-Royal. Please. For Paris. Find l'engoulevent – the nightjar. You can trust him.'

'Where is Maman?' Estella demanded.

'At home. Safe. Go!'

He slumped over again and Estella moved in closer to see how she could help him. She was able to lean him back against the bench, to see his pleading eyes. 'Go,' he repeated roughly. 'For Paris.'

Whatever she held meant nothing but danger. Yet it was important enough for him to have been injured seriously and also precarious enough for him to have added that one word – safe – when she'd asked about her mother. Had it only been an hour ago that Estella had been singing of her love for Paris? And now she was being asked to do something for her city.

Monsieur Aumont closed his eyes. Estella unrolled the bundle. Maps of a building drawn on silk. She could slide them into the pockets she'd sewn discreetly into the lining of her cape, pockets perfect for moving copied dresses around the city. But she was so conspicuous: a cape of blue-black velvet trimmed with silver beads over a shining gold dress.

'Go!' Monsieur Aumont whispered for a third time, through gritted teeth.

Estella nodded at last. Because now she felt the absolute truth of the words she'd sung at the club: her city was being violated and, perhaps, if she did as Monsieur Aumont was begging her to, she could prevent one more trespass on Paris's honour.

Chapter Two

Estella hurried out of the courtyard and into the street, the maps whispering like rumours in her pockets, unable to stop thinking of all the stories she'd heard: Germans dropping poisoned sweets by air into the streets to make the children in the city ill; Germans dressed up as nuns to spy on the citizens of Paris; German parachutists landing in the city at night. Every person she passed she feared might be part of the Fifth Column, fascist sympathisers helping the Germans, who would therefore do anything to stop her from reaching the theatre with her delivery. Still, she moved down Rue Beautreillis, past the ancient clock that hung rusted and unceasing, reminding Parisians that while their city might be immortal, they were not, and neither was she.

Then, hoping the circuitous route she'd taken might have allowed the city to draw its cape over her and hide her within its folds, she turned right and walked on to the Palais Royal. Finally she reached the theatre and thanked God for her dress which might be just fine enough to make it seem as if she belonged in a place like this.

She ascended the curving, plushly red staircase and, at the top, found herself in an intimate and opulent reception room – beautiful in any other circumstance – well lit by a chandelier so large and so dazzling that she drew her hand up to her eyes. Swagged red velvet curtains hung over openings that she assumed were entrances into the theatre itself. The walls were papered in deep burgundy trimmed with gold; everything was accented in gold – the chandelier, the balcony railing above, the cornices, the trimming around the ceiling fresco, the bas-relief that arched elegantly over the door at the far end of the room. Women wearing dresses Estella recognised as Chanel, Lelong, Callot Souers lounged in a scattering of low red velvet chaises and men laughed and sipped cognac and calvados. She knew that, for many, life cavorted on and the parties and revelry continued but after what she'd just witnessed, entering the theatre was like stepping onto the moon, or someplace else equally removed from the reality of a German army on the march into Paris.

The notes of a foxtrot rang out from a piano and a few couples began to dance, although there was hardly the space. Estella let the hood of her cape fall from her head, shook her long black hair loose and stepped into the room.

How would she know who or what the nightjar was? Her gaze swept over the women and then the men. She saw the eyes of one man, who stood in the centre of the room surrounded by a circle of people, flicker curiously towards her in a manner different from the lascivious stares a handful of others were bestowing upon her.

It wouldn't do to quail, to act as if she didn't belong. She crossed the room boldly, cape flying behind her, dress concealing her shaking legs. She didn't need to push her way through the circle because it opened to allow her in, the confident attitude of her shoulders and head, an attitude she'd copied from the house models she'd seen at the fashion shows, gaining her admittance.

Once at the man's side, she kissed both his cheeks, smiled and said a loud, 'Hello darling,' her voice again copied from the house models who tried to seduce the husbands of rich clients, often with success.

'I'm glad you came,' he murmured, sliding an arm around her waist, playing along so she knew she was right.

'I have an interest in ornithology,' she whispered. 'Especially les engoulevants.'

Nothing betrayed that what she'd said had aroused his interest. 'Shall we dance?' he asked, taking her hand and excusing himself from the crowd, leading her over to the couples swirling around in time to the music.

He went to undo the bow of her cape which was still tied at her neck but she shook her head, not wanting the maps to pass into the hands of the theatre attendants. 'I'd prefer to keep it on,' she said.

Then she found herself in his arms, circling the floor, the damned music having slowed to a waltz and, given the time of night and the state of inebriation of most of the theatregoers, proximity was all that seemed to matter and she knew it would look out of place if they were at arm's length. As he stepped closer to her, she did the same until they were chest to chest, cheek to cheek. He was all hard muscle and tanned skin, as if he spent his time outside rather than in an office, his hair almost as dark as hers and his eyes brown. He was extraordinarily handsome and in other circumstances she might have felt rather more pleased at the situation she'd found herself in. He wasn't French though; his command of the language was impeccable and so was his accent but it was almost too schooled, too perfect to be his birth-tongue.

He was waiting for her to say something. And Estella knew from the way Monsieur Aumont had spoken, from the blood on Monsieur's shirt that he, and perhaps her mother, were involved in something far more dangerous than helping refugees at the train station and that this man was a part of it. She wouldn't have trusted him with anything except that Monsieur Aumont, who she'd known since she was a child, had said she should.

'I believe I have something for you,' she said, switching to English.

That surprised him. 'Who the hell are you?' he asked, also in English, his voice controlled.

‘Nobody you know,’ she said, reverting to French.

‘You’re not very good at being surreptitious.’ He indicated the dress that she’d thought might spin heads, but that was the last thing she wanted right now.

‘No one with anything to hide wears a dress like this,’ she said. He tried to hide it but she heard it. A laugh.

‘Nothing about this is funny,’ she snapped, the last vestiges of her courage almost giving out. She needed to get this done and then return to help Monsieur Aumont – please God let him be all right – and finally go home and hope like she’d never hoped before that her mother was safe.

‘You’re very prickly.’

‘Because I’m so goddamned furious,’ she retorted. ‘I need to hang my cloak somewhere safe. Where can you recommend?’

‘Peter, over by the staircase, will look after it.’ All the while they danced and their faces continued to smile and nobody in the room except the man and Estella knew that things were not quite as they seemed.

Estella nodded and pulled herself out of his arms, untying the ribbon at her neck as she walked away, letting her hand rest for just an instant on the left side seam, assuming if he was the kind of man who took delivery of maps that were worth bleeding for, he’d notice her action. She had no desire to lose her cloak; it had cost her a month’s wages to buy the fabric. But it was a small price to pay if it helped Monsieur Aumont. And her mother. And Paris.

She passed the cloak to the man indicated and hurried down the stairs, desperate to be home. She strode out into the night, away from things she didn’t want to understand, things that scared her too much, things that made her realise the life she’d known, growing up in an atelier in Paris surrounded by beautiful things, was over.

The touch of a hand on her arm made her jump. She hadn’t heard footsteps but somehow he was standing beside her, passing her a black jacket. ‘Put this on,’ he said. ‘You won’t make it home alive at this time of night in that dress. Your cloak had blood on it. Is it yours?’

He moved a hand up towards her cheek and she flinched, but realised from the attitude of his hand that he hadn’t been about to strike her, but to do something far more gentle – to check that she wasn’t hurt. Her reaction made him move his hand away so swiftly it was almost like he’d never raised it.

‘It’s not my blood. It’s Monsieur—’

He cut in. ‘It’s best if I don’t know his name. Can you take me to him?’

Estella nodded and he followed her, his knowledge of Parisian streets seemingly as good as her own, never questioning her route, walking quickly but casually beside her. As they went through the Passage Charlemagne and into the Village Saint-Paul, its crumbling whitewashed courtyards creating a maze that nobody would be able to follow them through, he looked across at her quizzically.

She spoke the first words they’d shared since they left. ‘Not much further.’ Then, ‘Who are you?’

He shook his head. ‘It’s safer for you if I don’t tell you.’

A spy. She had to ask, even though she knew he could have, once they were hidden within the walls of the parish village, shot her or stabbed her or whatever it was men like him did to those who got in their way. ‘Whose side are you on?’

‘I haven’t said thank you,’ he said, which wasn’t really an answer. ‘But those papers will help the French people a great deal.’

‘And the British?’ She pressed for more information.

‘And all the Allies.’

Suddenly the wooden doors of the house on the Rue de Sévigné stood before them and Estella slipped into the courtyard. She stopped when she saw that Monsieur Aumont had fallen to the ground.

She darted forward.

He stopped her. ‘I’ll do what I can,’ he said. ‘He deserves a decent burial and he’ll get one. I promise.’

A burial. Oh God! What about . . . ? ‘Maman,’ Estella breathed, the word barely piercing the true night of a blacked-out city.

‘Go and see,’ he said.

‘And Monsieur?’

‘I’ll look after him.’

She turned, fear finally unbuttoning the coat of rashness she’d been wearing until then, seeing only her mother’s face, praying that Monsieur Aumont had, in his final moments, been right. That her mother was truly safe.

‘Get out of France, if you can. And take care.’

She heard the words slip through the air, the calculating tone gone now, replaced by something almost solicitous, and she held them to her as she raced for home. You take care too, Maman. I’m coming.

Thankfully the concierge was snoring in his chair when Estella returned to the apartment and she didn’t have to explain her wild-eyed appearance, or the fact she was wearing a man’s tuxedo jacket over her dress. She curved around and around the staircase, going up and up until she reached the top floor. Relief slid over her like silk when she found her mother in the dark kitchen, sipping coffee. But the relief fell to the floor when she saw the whiteness of her mother’s face and that her coffee lapped in the cup because of the way her hands were shaking.

‘Tell me,’ Estella said from the doorway.

‘I know very little,’ her mother whispered. ‘Monsieur Aumont is working for the English, I think. He never told me exactly. He couldn’t. But he has so many cousins and nephews, all Jewish of course, in Belgium, Switzerland and Germany; he was passing on information they sent to him. The Jewish people have no love for the Nazis, Estella. Nor does Monsieur Aumont. Nor I.’

‘And nor do I but does that mean you should risk your life?’

‘What would you have me do? You’ve seen them. The children we’ve helped OSE spirit out of Germany and into France and on to safety, the ones we can give nothing more to than soup and a hug. Their mothers and fathers taken from them just because of their religion. If we can help them, shouldn't we?

Of course they should and they had. To stand aside and do nothing was to give up Paris entirely, to give up on compassion, to agree that the world should be run by monsters.

'How involved are you?' Estella asked.

Her mother sipped her coffee. 'Not very. I've done nothing more than keep Monsieur Aumont's confidence. And help him find, in the crowd at Gare du Nord, the person he's looking for. It's easy to overlook a red neck scarf, or a green beret when only one person is watching. He always meets me back at the station and walks me home after he's done whatever he has to do. But tonight he didn't come back.'

'He's dead, Maman.'

'Dead?' The word was like a dropped stitch, ruining the fabric of their lives. Estella's mother reached for her hand. 'He can't be.'

'I saw him. I delivered some maps for him.'

'You did what?'

Estella tightened her grip on her mother's hand and told her what had happened. The house. The blood. The theatre. The man. That he said he'd take care of Monsieur Aumont's body. 'I think he meant it,' Estella ended quietly.

'But now you're mixed up in it too,' her mother said, terror bleaching her face of all colour. 'There are spies everywhere. And who knows how much longer until the full force of the Wehrmacht is here.' Her mother took a deep breath and sat up straight. 'You have to leave France.'

'I'm not going anywhere.'

'You are.' Her mother's voice was determined. 'You cannot stay here now. If anyone saw you tonight . . .' The sentence was unfinishable.

'Nobody saw me.'

'If you've seen the maps, you could easily end up like Monsieur Aumont. And here in Paris you'll never be anything more than a midinette in an atelier. Like me. I'm sending you to New York.'

'I like being a midinette in an atelier.' New York! How ridiculous.

'No you don't. Look at that dress. A couturier makes dresses like that. We're in the middle of a war. Soon there won't be a fashion industry left in Paris.'

'What would I do in New York?' Estella tried to keep her tone light, as if it was all a joke. But the image of Monsieur Aumont's body sprawled on the ground amid the weeds, the knowledge of how close her mother had come to danger, made her voice crack. 'I won't go by myself.'

'Yes, you will. Monsieur . . .' Her mother stopped, eyes flooded with tears. 'Monsieur Aumont asked me, weeks ago, to take over the atelier if anything happened to him. Our métier is a dying art. I must keep it alive, to honour him. I didn't touch those maps tonight. You did.'

'I'm not in any danger.' Get out of France, if you can. She remembered the words the man had spoken to her as she'd left.

'That's what Monsieur Aumont thought.'

Estella stood up and searched in the cupboard for a bottle of port. She poured herself a glass, and one for Jeanne, draining it quickly, unable to conceive of life without her mother. She'd been the one to first let Estella loose on a sewing machine when she was only five, who brought home scraps of fabric so that Estella could make ever more fantastical clothes for her cloth dolly, who had let Estella, during holidays and evenings when she had to work late, sit at her feet under the worktable making her own versions of flowers out of offcuts of material.

It had always been Estella and her mother. Estella and her mother walking to Les Halles every Saturday morning to buy food for the week. Estella and her mother praying in the church of Saint-Paul-Saint-Louis every Sunday morning. Estella and her mother lying in their shared bed side by side, some nights talking about what Estella had been up to at La Belle Chance with Huette and Renée, other nights falling into a dreamless sleep because Estella had been up sketching until late. There was nobody else. There never had been.

Occasionally, Estella would wish for a sister, so that she would still have the blessing of family once her mother was gone. But it was a futile wish. When Jeanne – God forbid – died, Estella would be on her own. And the absence of a father, beyond the fact that he'd died in the Great War, was the only thing her mother never spoke of.

Estella sat back down and took her mother's hand, searching for reassurance. 'There are no ships,' she said flatly. 'Unless I can get to Genoa and that's impossible.'

'Last week, the American ambassador placed an advertisement in Le Matin urging all American citizens to go directly to Bordeaux where the very last American ship would be waiting to take them to New York.'

'I'm a French citizen. How does that help me?'

Her mother pulled away. She walked through their tiny apartment, which most people of sound mind would probably be glad to leave behind: the lack of running water and elevator, the six flights of stairs, the tiny rooms – only one bedroom, a kitchen-cum-dining room whose table was more often used for sewing than eating, a space for a sofa, nothing decorative, just the bare necessities of plates and cups and pots and wardrobes and, of course, the sewing machine. But it was all they could afford on their midinette's wages.

Jean picked up her boîte à couture, an antique beechwood sewing box, the most beautiful thing they owned. It was lithographed on top with an image of a stand of wild iris pummelled by wind, stems leaning away in a manner Estella had always thought of as dancelike and subversive rather than weak and bending to the storm's will. Her mother opened the lid, took out the needle cases, the silver thimble, the spools of thread, the heavy scissors. Right at the bottom, she found a document. 'You have American papers,' she said, holding something out to Estella.

'What?' Estella replied.

'You have American papers,' her mother repeated firmly.

'How much did you pay for those? Nobody's going to fall for false papers, not now.'

'They're genuine.'

Estella rubbed her eyes. 'How can I possibly have American papers?'

The pause stretched out until Estella could almost hear it fray and then snap as her mother said, 'Your father was American. You were born there.'

'My father was a French soldier,' Estella insisted.

'He wasn't.'

Silence dropped like heavy jute cloth over the room, making it hard to breathe. It was her mother's turn to drain her glass.

'I went to New York once,' Jeanne finally said. 'To have you. I never planned to tell you any of this but keeping you safe is the only thing that matters now.'

Estella unfolded the papers and saw her name written inside. The papers supported, without question, her mother's story. 'But how?'

Tears flooded her mother's eyes with anguish. 'It hurts too much to talk about.'

'Maman!' Estella cried, horrified at the sight of her mother in tears. 'I'm sorry. I'm just trying to understand.'

'Understanding isn't important now. You must leave Paris. The embassy's last special train departs tomorrow. I went to the embassy last week to make enquiries. Just in case. Then I wasn't brave enough to tell you. I didn't want to lose you. But now I have to.'

'How can I leave you?' Estella's voice faltered, unable to imagine herself getting onto a train full of Americans, travelling through a country at war until she reached Bordeaux where she would get on a ship as an American citizen and travel to New York. Without Maman.

‘You can and you will.’

Estella’s response was a sob.

‘Cherie,’ her mother whispered, wrapping her daughter in her arms and tucking Estella’s head into her chest. ‘Don’t cry. If you cry, then I will too. And I might never stop.’

The desolation in her mother’s words undid Estella and she couldn’t make herself obey. Instead she sobbed as she’d never sobbed before, thinking of her mother alone in the atelier, alone in their apartment, alone in their bed. Thinking of the years unspooling before them both, without one another, never knowing when, or if, they might see each other again.

PURCHASE A COPY OF

The Paris Seamstress

by Natasha Lester

AT ONE OF THESE RETAILERS

PAPERBACK:

Bookworld >

Booktopia >

Boomerang >

QBD >

Readings >

EBOOK:

Amazon >

Booktopia >

Google Play >

iBooks >

Kobo >

FIND YOUR LOCAL BOOKSHOP >

PURCHASE THE AUDIO EDITION - Audible >